The mini fridges of the first hotel had Magnum ice while the restaurant served solid metro city cuisine. Homely inner architecture and cable TV.
I landed at the Hynix helipad — an unknown maker of readable access memorie 10 minutes too late.
The fast method of transport was made possible by a decentralized system of transfers between private [redacted] grounds, properties i.e. Extremely expensive and sometimes the victim of pirates.
[redacted] Cryptography was used again, as had become usual. Whereby landing space names were [redacted] assigned domains. (NCTOS as far as I could recall was a television and radio station.)

Shadow organized powder 5-2
I only landed there once.
Samsung helipad had strong security and one of the strongest cryptographies. It was said to have never been hacked.
Landing there was an experience on its own, [redacted] Hynix had an outside fountain. (Further luxuries [redacted] inside the building.) On the whole it was in the bottom middle of helipads.
The Zaibatsus and Triad-connected Chinese companies refused entry / landing altogether,

The Samsung building, one of the most expensive, for example had a Japanese garden on its roof next to the all black landing area (yellow-orange lines) whose trees bore citrus fruits in the summer.
This notable feature was enhanced in the winter by the pale gray frozen lake.
[Visible as we passed.]

The vending machine at Hynix H was a master piece. Heaviest industrial design. It had snacks and meals I never saw any where else.

Samsung had Army protection. NCTOS was more amateurish. Delays and outsourced, foreign staff (noticeable by the accent). Two large, well-known incidents.

Bottom tier of helipads were all man-less for the great part. The worst went as far as automating radio operation and were not somewhere you wanted to land. Privacy, they said, was one advantage of the whole system.

At the vending machine I picked a bottle and Korean cup-noodles (barbecue meat)

'Shadow organized powder'

I was brought the shadow organized powder. The virile guards stood aside while I was *[illegible]. The job was made harder by the fact that the idea did not escape my mind that I planned to eat serpent for New Year this year.

*inspecting the illegal substance.
